

Newtron – Employee Stories

Dresden, February 2017

Newtron Employee Robert Barthold: "As a developer, this is the place you can let loose."

Developing procurement systems for leading global automotive suppliers and technology and media corporations is certainly great fun. Robert Barthold finds it particularly appealing to be creative as a software developer.

We don't develop everything along mainstream lines," adds the 31-year-old. "For example, when a request comes in, we are free to solve it as we see fit, to a certain extent. For instance, for the catalog assessment included in the new procurement system, I had a free hand and could 'go wild' with the technicians." This included our own Newtron framework and current web technologies such as JavaScript, HTML 5 or CSS 3.

"I enjoy working for Newtron," says Barthold. "With the help of our high-performance framework, swift developments are possible, which enabled us to set up the multi-vendor catalog solution within a very short timeframe. In addition, Dresden is, despite the current negative headlines, a great city worth living in. The vast majority of people are open-hearted and courteous, there are many cultural offerings and the cost of living is moderate compared to other big cities," he promotes. Last but not least, he praises the familiar working atmosphere. "We really like to hang out together after work," he says.

As a developer, would you not also like to contribute your own ideas, be able to look through the office window all the way to Lilienstein in Saxony, Switzerland and receive free drinks and fruit every day? Then come and join us. We look forward to having you here!
